Victoria was not happy about the marriage. She did not want to leave England, and she did not want to marry a man she did not love. But she had no choice. Her father had made up his mind, and she had to obey.

The ship sailed for weeks, and during that time Victoria had plenty of time to think about her future. She wondered what her husband would be like. Would he be kind? Would he be handsome? Would he love her?

She also wondered what life in America would be like. Would it be different from life in England? Would she be happy there?

As the ship approached America, Victoria's heart began to pound. She was about to start a new chapter in her life, and she did not know what the future held.

Chapter 2: The Wedding

The wedding was held in a small church in the town of Marietta, Georgia. Victoria was dressed in a white wedding dress, and her husband, Captain James Buchanan, was dressed in a black military uniform.

The ceremony was simple, but it was beautiful. Victoria and James exchanged vows, and then they were pronounced husband and wife.

After the ceremony, there was a reception at the Buchanan plantation. The guests ate, drank, and danced. Victoria and James danced their first dance as husband and wife, and then they cut the wedding cake.

Victoria was happy on her wedding day. She had married a kind and handsome man, and she was excited to start her new life in America.

Chapter 3: The Plantation

The Buchanan plantation was a large, two-story house with a white picket fence. It was surrounded by fields of cotton and tobacco.

Victoria and James lived in the plantation house with James's parents and his sister. Victoria quickly became accustomed to life on the plantation. She learned how to cook, sew, and garden. She also learned how to ride horses and shoot guns.

Victoria enjoyed her life on the plantation. She loved the fresh air and the open spaces. She also loved the people she lived with. James's parents were kind and welcoming, and his sister was like a sister to her.

Chapter 4: The War

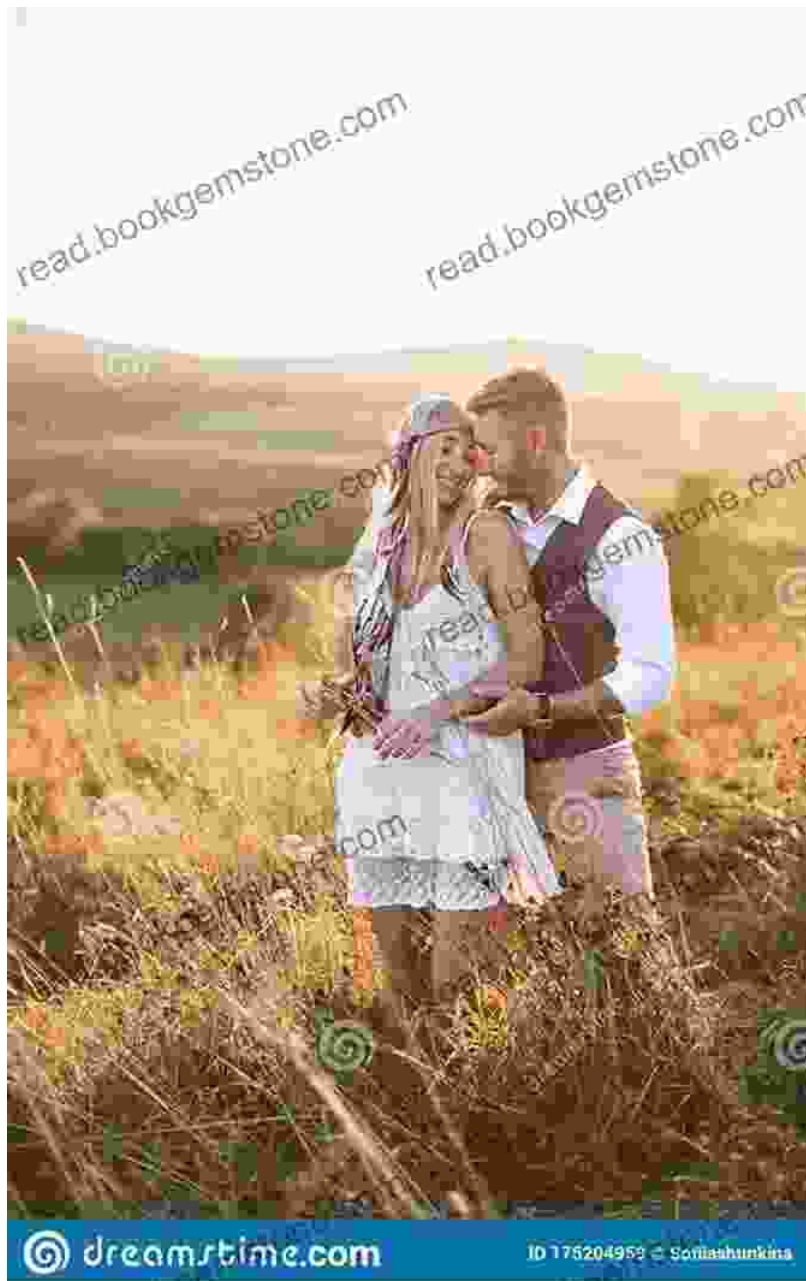

In 1861, the American Civil War broke out. James was called to fight for the Confederacy, and Victoria was left alone on the plantation.

Victoria was worried about James, but she knew that he was doing what he believed was right. She supported him, and she prayed for his safety.

The war lasted for four years, and during that time Victoria lived in constant fear. She did not know if James was alive or dead. She did not know if she would ever see him again.

Chapter 5: The Reunion

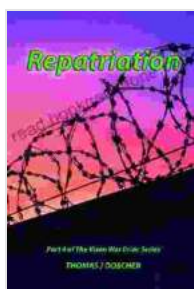

In 1865, the war ended. James came home to the plantation, and Victoria was overjoyed to see him.

James had been wounded in the war, but he had recovered. He was still the same kind and handsome man that Victoria had married.

Victoria and James were reunited, and they lived happily ever after.
